Though many of them were maimed and broken, not one of them that did not vie with the other in showing honor to the man who had done so much for them. A large number of the employes of the Randolph paper box factory also occupied seats reserved for them, and delegations from the Daughters of the Confederacy, the Junior Hollywood Association and the regents of the Confederation. The gallery and what remained of the main auditorium, were thrown open to individual friends of the family. The service was brief, consisting of the formal rite of the Catholic Church. The mass for the soul of the dead was not said until yesterday morning. Bishop Van do Vyver, assisted by Fathers Bowler, Magri, O'Relly and Hannigan, No enlogy was said. There was a U. D. C. emblematic design, a green wreath of laurel, surroundin a small Confederate flag. The other design came from the family. It was a Confederate battle flag. The thirteen stars were white immortelles, upon bars of purple, all upon a field of red. The effect wes very beautiful and appropriate. The latter was placed at the head of the grave, and the gift of the Tennessee Daughters of the Confederacy at the foot.

HONOR THE CHIEFTAIN

Patriotic Plan of the Ladies of the Confederate Memorial and Literary Society Presented to the Street Committee.

That the memory of General R. E. Lee the gallant Virginia gentleman and like wise noble chieftan, together with the "Lost Cause." is held in eacred reverence in Richmond, was well attested yesterday afternoon at a meeting of the Counoil Committee on Streets, when the ladies of the Confederate Memorial Society petitioned to have the names of the four streets leading to the Lee monument in the extreme west end of the city so changed as to make them conform with the four Virginia places of residence the mourned soldier made his home during his long and useful life,

CHANGE FRANKLIN STREET. CHANGE FRANKLIN STRBET.
Even though one of the stroots whose name it is proposed to change is the favored and fashionable Franklin Street, and many of the interested ladies reside on this thoroughfare, the organization is united in its effort along the line referred to, and they are sanguine of success. It is proposed to change it to Westmoreland Avenue, but this does not mean that the streef in its entirety is to lose its present streef in its entirety is to lose its presen identity, for only that portion, the one block leading from Lombardy to the monument will be altered. After passing the statue it has been suggested that it be called Lexington. The harmony of the idea is made more plain when it is understood that the ladles favor the term avenue in preference to the commonplace word street. So it has been further suggested, and will be considered, that the thoroughfares running at right angles to Maln and Broad Streets, respectively, be called Arlington and Richmond Avenues. identity, for only that portion, the on

When the caption of the petition was read, the committee, all of whom had previously been made acquainted with the details of the project and the laudable reasons, referred the matter to the City Engineer and the delegation from Lee Ward, Messrs, John W. Minor and Harry Huber. There was no discussion, as it was practically necessary that it take

THE PETITION.

The communication from Mrs. Minor follows in full. It is interesting:

To the Honorable Chairman of the Street

Committee: The ladies of the Confederate Memoria The ladles of the Confederate Memorial Literary Society are deeply interested in emphasizing the historical interest which attaches to Richmond as the capital of the Confederate States. Their initial work of establishing a museum in the White House of the Confederacy has long since outgrown that limit, and they have secured many improvements in the confederacy has bettern by object lessents. long since outgrown that think, and they have secured many improvements in the matter of teaching history by object leasens, and thereby rendering our city more attractive and of greater dignity. The streets in this locality are so recently laid off that there is no general knowledge of their names, and we think that if a change were made in some of these it would be very welcome to the property owners, very practicable in the present condition of that locality and very valuable as a most permanent record of the homes of our great chieftain. Wo would suggest that the four streets leading to the monument be named as follows: Franklin, from Lombardy to Monument, be called Westmereland, to mark the lirthcitement by Irying to Counter by ps called Westmoreland, to mark the birth-place of Lee; from the monument west it should be called Lexington, his last home. The New Yorker is a preacher of rare power, and his personal labors among the working classes gave his words an added interest and importance. Frequent applause interrupted him, and when he was done the pastors were unanimous in the expression of the opinion that the talk was one of the finest they had ever heard.

The subject discussed by Mr. McNutt was "The Sanctuary and the Shop." The character of the audience permitted him to go into some elaborate details, which he dld. While he did not favor the saloon, of course, he declared that it offered to the lower classes opportunities for case and comfort not provided elsewhere, and that the only way to counteract the influence of the whiskey shops was to provide these opportunities under more favorable conditions. The "industrial life," as it is known and sought in the North, was condemned by the speaker, who predicted for the South an "industrial bell," with the spread of the great industries throughout this section of the land, unless a more satisfactory relation between employer and employe can be accomplished.

On Sunday afternoon Mr. McNutt preached at the Bijou Theatre under the auspiess of the Young Men's Christian Association. About 460 mon were present. The service was a most interesting and inspiring one. Sunday night Mr. McNutt preached at Union-Station Methodist Church for Dr. John Hannon.
